I/O Solutions Assessment Exercises and Types

The Assessment Center (AC) is intended to complement the multiple-choice job knowledge assessment and will measure your skills and abilities, as well as your application of job knowledge. While in many situations there are department or other source materials (e.g., General Orders) that provide guidance on the appropriate response to a situation, candidates must also use their problem-solving skills, supervisory skills, oral communication skills, and many other skills and abilities to perform the job effectively. The primary goal of the AC is to measure these job-relevant skills and abilities. The following is a list of the various assessment exercises and types that you could see:

- Structured Oral Interview (SOI)
- Staff Meeting (aka Shift Meeting or Roll Call)
- Community Meeting Structured Role-Play
- Highly structured role-plays (Subordinate & Citizen)
- Presentation Exercise (e.g., Topic-based Training, Tactical or Operations Plan, Staffing Plan, etc.)
- Background Qualifications Presentation
- Administrative In-Basket/Inbox Presentation
- Written Exercise
- Tactical Exercise

Each assessment exercise will be discussed in more detail in the next section.

Structured Oral Interview (SOI)

The SOI typically lasts 13-15 minutes and candidates may be provided with questions in advance to allow for preparation. The instructional material you will be given will have rules, expectations, and information on how the process will run and the question content.

Each question is timed separately, so if you have three different scenarios that you must respond to within the 13-15 minutes, you do not have to self-manage your overall time. Instead, we will provide you with time limits for each question. If there is a "Hot-Call", it typically is the first question. Note that the response times are often "short" due to the amount of information that must be covered in that amount of time. We only have 13-15 minutes, and we wish to include as many "opportunities" for you as is possible. Thus, if you have an area that represents a weakness, you have other questions that represent an opportunity for you to demonstrate your job knowledge, skills, and abilities. On some occasions, there are follow-up questions that must be read. You will know there is a follow-up question but will not know what the question is. These are given consistently to all candidates when used and assessors will never go "off script".

Questions given in the initial preparation period are NOT read again. Our rationale is that this would take up too much time and, instead of wasting that time, we would rather hear how you would handle that situation. Assessors will not repeat a follow-up question that is read. Once instructed to begin your response, the time will begin on a question.

Copyright © 2026, IOS, Inc. – CONFIDENTIAL/TRADE SECRET

Make sure your responses are logical, orderly, and hit all aspects of the response (initial actions, subsequent actions, follow-up actions, related administrative work, etc.). Make sure your responses are comprehensive such that they address all personnel involved or all aspects of the given problem.

Examples of SOI content include the following:

- Management/Leadership of company/shift: Leadership approach; Expectations of staff; Approach to managing day-to-day shift activities
- Dealing with personnel problems: Sexual harassment; Poor performance
- Focus on the community or citizens
- Administrative Challenges: Similar to an in-basket
- Current dept. issues, operational issues/concerns, etc.

Staff Meeting or Personnel Exercise (aka Shift Brief or Roll Call)

The staff meeting typically consists of three parts when used in full. The first would be a management introduction, where candidates must explain their management approach, leadership philosophy, and his/her expectations. The second part would involve specific current issues framed as an email or two. This information will be provided with the instructions. You are expected to discuss these issues and potential solutions with the staff. The third part of the exercise would transition to a question-and-answer session with the staff. The questions would not be given to you ahead of time, so you do not have time to prepare for them. This is meant to simulate a real-life staff meeting. Some of the pitfalls with this exercise involve not talking enough about one's leadership/management style or current issues. Similarly, for the question-and-answer session, some pitfalls include not giving enough thought to the questions asked.

Another exercise would be the personnel exercise, where you are given detailed background information about a situation involving personnel. These situations range from performance issues to conflicts between coworkers. You are expected to give a presentation detailing how you would handle and ultimately resolve the situation (e.g., actions to be taken, additional information to collect, detailed discussions with involved individuals, etc.).

Community Meeting Structured Role Play

The community meeting exercise typically consists of two parts when used in full. Candidates are given detailed background information describing the situation (e.g., why the community meeting is occurring, the group/association you will be meeting with, etc.). The first part would be a presentation where you would explain your understanding of the issue, actions you would take to address the issue, and/or the department's stance on the issue. The second part involves a question-and-answer session with the hypothetical "community" from either a video prompt or the assessors playing the role of community members. You would not know these questions ahead of time as to simulate a real-life community meeting. There are typically three to five questions that are timed individually and given to all candidates. Some pitfalls of this exercise involve not representing the department well, not espousing the values of the department, or interacting with the community members in an insincere manner. Another pitfall would be failing to address all elements of the community meeting.

Citizen Meeting Structured Role Play

In the citizen meeting structured role play exercise, you would receive background information (e.g., the reason for meeting, what occurred up to that point, etc.) on an issue during your preparation period. You would then meet with the hypothetical citizen, played by an actor, to discuss problems, address any concerns, and represent the department well. This exercise would be highly structured, meaning the citizen's dialogue would be scripted and consistent across all candidates. Similar to the community meeting, the pitfalls of this exercise occur when a candidate is dismissive, interrupts the citizen, or fails to address all of the relevant issues.

Subordinate Meeting Structured Role Play

The subordinate meeting is a structured, one-on-one role play exercise. You would receive background information on the issue during the preparation time. Next, you would meet with the subordinate (played by an actor) to discuss the issues, address concerns, and set expectations. Some pitfalls include not holding the subordinate accountable for their performance and not setting expectations. This would be another highly structured exercise where the subordinate's responses remain the same across candidates.

Presentation Exercise

For the presentation exercise, you would be expected to prepare and deliver a presentation on a specific topic area. You would be given detailed background information during the preparation period, and you would have to develop a plan for addressing the issue. Topics might be issues that you must address, developing operations or tactical plans, addressing current issues in the agency and how you would resolve them, or discussing a policy that is currently being reviewed and evaluated. Some of the pitfalls of this exercise are that candidates are not comprehensive enough and fail to discuss all of the different elements of the topic.

Background Qualifications Presentation

Often called an oral resume, the background qualifications presentation typically involves three parts. In the first part, you must discuss your job-related experience and qualifications. You would discuss your work history in relation to the agency, any highlights, take-away experiences, knowledge, skills, and abilities (KSAs) you developed, and why you are qualified for the promotion. It is important to discuss your skill set or knowledge obtained, including how this was obtained, what it includes, and how it can be beneficial to the department. In this part, you will also discuss the quality of your work experiences. It is also acceptable to discuss other work experience, community involvement, etc. The second part involves discussing your training, education, and other relevant training (e.g., military service); this can include non-standard or specialized training as well. The third part focuses on leadership experiences and management KSAs, preferably within the department. This is especially important for candidates applying to higher ranks. You also may discuss your leadership style or approach in this section. Personal characteristics that fit the role, reasons for seeking promotion, and steps to prepare for the promotion are also acceptable to discuss during this exercise. The goal is to present your career highlights and achievements to the assessors.

Administrative In-Basket/In-Box Presentation

The in-basket or inbox presentation involves viewing 5-12 items in writing during your preparation period (e.g., memos, voicemails, or emails from subordinates, peers, citizens, politicians, etc.). We typically run an "oral in-basket," meaning you would give a presentation on how you would handle each item. You would be expected to explain the timeliness and priority of each item. Some pitfalls occur when candidates are not comprehensive enough during their presentation or when candidates fail to realize that some items are interrelated.

Written Exercise

The written exercise can cover a variety of content areas. Similar to a problem-solving exercise, you would be given detailed background information to which you must write a response. You would be given formatting instructions when typing a response and a template in which to write your response. Some pitfalls are that candidates focus more on the formatting than the content and organization of their message. Another pitfall involves failing to address all topics given in the background information.

Tactical Exercise

The Tactical typically lasts 13-20 minutes. If utilized, the tactical exercise will be presented to you via a video either on a tablet computer or projected onto a screen. The tactical exercises we utilize for fire departments are created using the digital combustion software, Fire Studio. These simulations are then compiled into a single video which will play out in front of you in the exercise room. You will respond to an evolving fire incident, assuming the rank for which you are testing. You will have a set amount of time to respond to each question. This exercise is not interactive in the sense that you would have role players or individuals that you are interacting with and there is no branching. All candidates will view the same video from start to finish and will provide responses to the same questions throughout the exercise, when prompted. We ask questions in the video as the incident progresses with the intention of gaining more insight into your thought process in the moment as if you were on scene. Any time you are asked a question within this type of exercise, you should be sure to be as detailed as possible and provide as much information regarding your rationale or thought process.

Candidates are given detailed background information describing the situation (e.g., why the community meeting is occurring, the group/association you will be meeting with, etc.). The first part would be a presentation where you would explain your understanding of the issue, actions you would take to address the issue, and/or the department's stance on the issue. The second part involves a question-and-answer session with the hypothetical "community" from either a video prompt or the assessors playing the role of community members. You would not know these questions ahead of time as to simulate a real-life community meeting. There are typically three to five questions that are timed individually and given to all candidates. Some pitfalls of this exercise involve not representing the department well, not espousing the values of the department, or interacting with the community members in an insincere manner. Another pitfall would be failing to address all elements of the community meeting.

Citizen Meeting Structured Role Play

In the citizen meeting structured role play exercise, you would receive background information (e.g., the reason for meeting, what occurred up to that point, etc.) on an issue during your preparation period. You would then meet with the hypothetical citizen, played by an actor, to discuss problems, address any concerns, and represent the department well. This exercise would be highly structured, meaning the citizen's dialogue would be scripted and consistent across all candidates. Similar to the community meeting, the pitfalls of this exercise occur when a candidate is dismissive, interrupts the citizen, or fails to address all of the relevant issues.

Subordinate Meeting Structured Role Play

The subordinate meeting is a structured, one-on-one role play exercise. You would receive background information on the issue during the preparation time. Next, you would meet with the subordinate (played by an actor) to discuss the issues, address concerns, and set expectations. Some pitfalls include not holding the subordinate accountable for their performance and not setting expectations. This would be another highly structured exercise where the subordinate's responses remain the same across candidates.

Presentation Exercise

For the presentation exercise, you would be expected to prepare and deliver a presentation on a specific topic area. You would be given detailed background information during the preparation period, and you would have to develop a plan for addressing the issue. Topics might be issues that you must address, developing operations or tactical plans, addressing current issues in the agency and how you would resolve them, or discussing a policy that is currently being reviewed and evaluated. Some of the pitfalls of this exercise are that candidates are not comprehensive enough and fail to discuss all of the different elements of the topic.

Background Qualifications Presentation

Often called an oral resume, the background qualifications presentation typically involves three parts. In the first part, you must discuss your job-related experience and qualifications. You would discuss your work history in relation to the agency, any highlights, take-away experiences, knowledge, skills, and abilities (KSAs) you developed, and why you are qualified for the promotion. It is important to discuss your skill set or knowledge obtained, including how this was obtained, what it includes, and how it can be beneficial to the department. In this part, you will also discuss the quality of your work experiences. It is also acceptable to discuss other work experience, community involvement, etc. The second part involves discussing your training, education, and other relevant training (e.g., military service); this can include non-standard or specialized training as well. The third part focuses on leadership experiences and management KSAs, preferably within the department. This is especially important for candidates applying to higher ranks. You also may discuss your leadership style or approach in this section. Personal characteristics that fit the role, reasons for seeking promotion, and steps to prepare for the promotion are also acceptable to discuss during this exercise. The goal is to present your career highlights and achievements to the assessors.

In-Basket/In-Box Presentation

The in-basket or inbox presentation involves viewing 5-12 items in writing during your preparation period (e.g., memos, voicemails, or emails from subordinates, peers, citizens, politicians, etc.). We typically run an "oral in-basket," meaning you would give a presentation on how you would handle each item. You would be expected to explain the timeliness and priority of each item. Some pitfalls occur when candidates are not comprehensive enough during their presentation or when candidates fail to realize that some items are interrelated.

Written Exercise

The written exercise can cover a variety of content areas. Similar to a problem-solving exercise, you would be given detailed background information to which you must write a response. You would be given formatting instructions when typing a response and a template in which to write your response. Some pitfalls are that candidates focus more on the formatting than the content and organization of their message. Another pitfall involves failing to address all topics given in the background information.

Tactical Exercise

The Tactical typically lasts 13-20 minutes. If utilized, the tactical exercise will be presented to you via a video either on a tablet computer or projected onto a screen. The tactical exercises we utilize for fire departments are created using the digital combustion software, Fire Studio. These simulations are then compiled into a single video which will play out in front of you in the exercise room. You will respond to an evolving fire incident, assuming the rank for which you are testing. You will have a set amount of time to respond to each question. This exercise is not interactive in the sense that you would have role players or individuals that you are interacting with and there is no branching. All candidates will view the same video from start to finish and will provide responses to the same questions throughout the exercise, when prompted. We ask questions in the video as the incident progresses with the intention of gaining more insight into your thought process in the moment as if you were on scene. Any time you are asked a question within this type of exercise, you should be sure to be as detailed as possible and provide as much information regarding your rationale or thought process.
